

Aspiring Athletes

When I first started playing golf, it was really difficult to juggle schoolwork and golf. I would find I'd go to school and then I'd be really tired after school and too tired to play golf. I wasn't getting my hours up but I had to train.

I heard from a friend about distance education and I thought it would be a really good option. Distance education works great for me because it's opened up so many opportunities. At the moment I'm going to a college in the city for golf, and I'm studying a diploma. Also, when I go away to competitions, I can go a couple of days early and have solid practice on the new course and still be able to do my schoolwork in the afternoons.

Another advantage of distance education is that I could do a diploma in conjunction with schooling. I could finish school a year earlier with a higher qualification.

As a result of distance education, it's allowed me to play in a lot more competitions, and because of that I've won Bathurst Peter O'Malley Junior Masters a few months ago and Jack Newton Junior Golf sent me to Alice Springs to play in the Alice Springs Open.

I really recommend Australian Christian College Distance Education to any athlete out there who's trying to pursue their dream in sport and complete school at the same time.
